In the early 1660s, the concept of a dedicated marine force was yet to be established. It was during this time that the British Empire sought to protect its expanding interests overseas. The need for a specialized amphibious fighting force became apparent, and thus the Royal Marines were born.

It wasn't until May 28, 1664, that the Royal Marine Corps conducted their inaugural landing. Their destination: the island of Tangier, which was under British control at the time. This mission marked the beginning of a legacy that still resonates within the Royal Marines today.
